

I am extremely opposed to the Consumer Banking Association's petition to call consumers at will. The Telephone Privacy Act has allowed consumers to not have to hang up on those who interfere with daily life activities. The Bankers Association open the door for those who pray on people who can least afford to donate to causes without merit. As an educator, I teach my students to respect others privacy. Money must be an overriding factor in the industry's desire to disturb the privacy of those who do not want their privacy interfered with after a long day at work. I wonder how many bankers like to hear someone contact their homes and disturb their families after spending an entire day working with people who have financial issues. It seems unfair to those of us who don't want to be called at all hours with solitations.
